CHAPTER 3 — Population and the Economy: The Ups and Downs of One and Two

- ¹ For one of the most emotive views of this kind, see Mei Fong's One Child: The Story of China's Most Radical Experiment, London: Oneworld, 2016.
- ² See, for example, Xiaodong Wang, 'Two-child policy expected to be approved by top legislator', China Daily, 21 December 2011, online at: http://www.chinadaily.com.cn/china/2015-12/21/content_22759611.htm
- ³ See for examples, S. Basten and Q. Jiang, 'Fertility in China: an uncertain future', Population Studies: vol.69, no.1 (2015): 97–105; and Z. Zhao, 'Closing a sociodemographic chapter of Chinese history', Population and Development Review, vol.41, no.4 (2015): 681–686.
- ⁴ The starting logic behind this pessimism comes from one of the fundamental 'laws' in economics: the law of diminishing returns. According to this law — which like all economics laws isn't true everywhere and always — additional workers in an economy will increase total output, but at a diminishing rate. In other words, two workers will produce more output than one worker, but less than twice as much output as one worker. This means that, as the population increases, output per worker, or labour productivity, will fall. Or conversely, as population growth slows, output per worker (on average) will increase.
