A SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY OF ABORIGINAL HISTORY AND SOCIAL CHANGE: THESSES AND PUBLISHED RESEARCH TO 1976

Diane Barwick, James Urry, David Bennett

Introduction 111

Key to symbols and abbreviations 112

Classification:
1. Relevant published bibliographies 113
2. Stability and change in Aboriginal society: evidence and opinion (major modern publications in anthropology, archaeology, human biology, linguistics and psychology) 114
3. Writing Aboriginal history:
   a. biographies and studies of major writers; histories of scientific thought on Aborigines; review articles relevant to Aboriginal history; studies of Aborigines in Australian literature 118
   b. Aboriginal biographies and reminiscences 126
4. Reconstructing the past: 128
document collections and general histories; archaeological and ethno-historical studies; documentary studies of 'frontier' race relations and nineteenth century government and church policy
5. Recording social change: 141
twentieth century policy and administration, race relations and urban migration: reports by Aborigines, administrators, anthropologists, architects, economists, educators, lawyers, politicians, political scientists and welfare workers

Time and space limitations precluded annotation of this bibliography. The compilers decided that a simple chronological classification (nineteenth century reconstruction and twentieth century recording) would best serve students of Aboriginal history.

This division between 'paperwork' and 'fieldwork' well represents the present state of Aboriginal historical studies. W.E.H. Stanner and C.D. Rowley have commented on the failure of historians and anthropologists to use each other's skills, and this separation of activity can be demonstrated by comparing two major bibliographies. For his projected complete bibliography on Aborigines John Greenway had collected 22,638 items by 1957 (and we suspect an equal amount has been published since); yet Hogan, Yarwood and Ward's index of 4,019 articles on Australian history in fifty-four historical and political journals, plus Oceania, to the end of 1973 lists only some 150 papers which mention Aborigines.

As we have focussed specifically on Aboriginal reaction to European contact and administration this bibliography does not indicate the prodigious amount of published research by anthropologists, nor the volume of reminiscences and general accounts of European exploration and settlement to be found in the various historical journals, now mostly well-indexed. We attempt only to update Greenway's listing, and have concentrated upon recent research, much of it in unpublished theses.

Other manuscripts, government reports and newspaper clippings were necessarily omitted, but useful listings of recent material may be found in the Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies Newsletter. From 1977, comprehensive annual bibliographies will be published by the Institute.

The library and bibliographical indexes of this Institute constitute an extraordinary — and sadly unknown — resource for the study of Aboriginal history. We would like to express our gratitude to the Senior Bibliographer, Miss B.J. Kirkpatrick, and to all members of the staff: their work has made this publication possible.
