

A LISTING OF ABORIGINAL PERIODICALS

Marcia Langton and Brownlee Kirkpatrick

This bibliography of journals, newspapers and newsletters issued by Aboriginal and white interest groups will prove an invaluable resource to students of Aboriginal history.

The list is based on the collection held at the Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies and was compiled by the Senior Bibliographer, Brownlee Kirkpatrick. Many people involved in Aboriginal affairs will recognise titles amongst the seventy-nine published by Aboriginal and Islander groups and communities and the thirty published by 'white' interest groups.

Students of Aboriginal history will find useful the early publications such as The Aboriginal, or Flinders Island Chronicle and the first 'advancement movement' newsletters, such as Abo Call. These contain the views of Aborigines on their social and political situation, views which were rarely reported elsewhere. Today Aboriginal thought is recorded in widely distributed national publications such as Identity and Aboriginal and Islander Forum. These will be pertinent to students of contemporary Aboriginal affairs.

The publications of Aboriginal organisations sometimes appeared irregularly, or soon ceased to appear. But, particularly in the case of the 'advancement movement' newsletters, many titles disappeared because they were subsumed in another journal. The growth of a national Aboriginal movement meant the unification of many smaller groups, whose views became expressed in national publications such as the annual reports of the Federal Council for the Advancement of Aborigines and Torres Strait Islanders (FCAATSI).

Today many communities publish newsletters, often in the local Aboriginal language, as a resource for the language renaissance which is occurring with the home-lands and outstation movement. An example is the Yuṭana dhäwu from Yirrkala. Gabalgu jurra from Maningrida contains interesting local coverage of the activities of mining companies in the Top End.

The land council newsletters are the major published source of Aboriginal views on land rights. They are written and published in an Aboriginal context — unlike the 'whitefella' media whose coverage of land rights is distorted by cultural concepts such as 'newsworthiness', business interests, and just plain bias and ignorance. Land Rights News, published by the Northern Land Council, has covered most of the land claims lodged from the Top End, and is distributed to all Aboriginal groups in the Council's area.

The Aboriginal context is one of burgeoning consciousness, self-organisation and confidence. The Aboriginal coverage of the meaning and effect of whitefella politics is astute and uncompromising. An example is the North Queensland Land Council's coverage of Aurukun and Mornington Island affairs in early 1978 in N.Q. Messagstick. These newsletters are firstly political resources, keeping Aboriginal people in touch with their organisations and activities and informing their white readership of the subjective Aboriginal point of view.

Other newsletters and journals were published by white interest groups. Often the missionary organs provided only news of the 'success' of the Christian missions to Aborigines, for the white congregations whose donations subsidised missionary activities. Their reports were probably a major inspiration to the white view of Aborigines, and could give insights into Australian racism. Such journals will prove relevant for students of the colonisation of Aborigines.

The periodicals in the second part of this listing are important to Aboriginal history because they include much material written by Aborigines, or information on the lives of individuals and communities which is recorded nowhere else. The church periodicals listed here could be an important historical resource for researchers wishing to write community histories and biographies. Until the end of the 1960s government reports and newspapers scarcely mentioned Aboriginal views and activities. Publications like the Aborigines' Friends' Association Annual Report, the Aborigines Protector, On Aboriginal Affairs, Smoke Signals, and Victorian Aboriginal Group Annual Report gave a relatively well-informed and sympathetic coverage of Aboriginal opinions and political protest activities from the 1930s to the 1960s.

It concerns me that publications, as written expressions, have a limited value for the Aboriginal population, which in so many areas is still non-literate or semi-literate. An increasingly valuable alternative is the use of tape-recordings as news organs. The Moongoong Darwung organisation in Western Australia, for instance, publishes tapes and sends them to subscribers.

My own experience, working on various Aboriginal newsletters and newspapers, has made me understand the importance of simply having the resources and skills for self-expression in an often hostile white environment which, because it has the power and resources, has historically defined us. In Redfern, in 1976, the Black Women's Action Group began to envisage Koori-bina. We firstly needed some means of reply to the racist slander published in Sydney's afternoon press. Secondly, we were inspired by Abo Call, published in 1938 in Sydney by an Aboriginal political group. The descendants of these activists were in 1976 working in Redfern for the same aims as were articulated in Abo Call almost forty years previously.

As bilingual education and literacy are brought to more communities, especially remote ones, we can look forward to exciting and diverse expressions.

The following list of periodicals is divided in two parts: journals published by Aboriginal communities and organisations, followed by journals published by 'white'-controlled welfare and advancement associations and institutions. Included in the first list are some periodicals which were not under Aboriginal control in their early stages but later were either wholly or partially edited and written by Aborigines and Torres Strait Islanders. Although editorial responsibility for a few periodicals is uncertain (such as school journals in Aboriginal communities), they are included here because they serve an Aboriginal readership. It was thought useful to include journals published by welfare and advancement organisations whose membership was mainly non-Aboriginal. Some in this category are included in the first list of Aboriginal journals due to later changes of editorial responsibility. Journals published after 1969 by the successors to these organisations are omitted.

These alphabetical lists, based on the collection in the Library of the Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies, are not complete.

The Senior Bibliographer (P.O. Box 553, Canberra, A.C.T. 2601) would therefore welcome information on journals not recorded here, and copies of the missing issues in runs of other listed journals. The Library will photocopy and return rare originals if owners have no duplicates.

Details are recorded in the following order: title of journal except for organisations issuing journals with common titles such as Bulletin, Journal, Newsletter, in which case the entry is under the name of the organisation; volume and or issue/part number; date of first and last issue (if publication has ceased); place of publication and actual date of publication if different from the date on the title-page; information on variant titles, irregular numbering and any other relevant details. A dash following the volume/issue number and date indicates that the journal is published currently. Where such details are not known, the Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies Library holdings are noted as a guide.
